

I made last ditch effort when i was hopelessly lost. It serves as a beacon of my own design. A series of events led me to my version of rock bottom. I realized if I didn't pivot I probably would not be able to keep going. Trying to full-send a music career when I wasn't actually ready was something that left me broke and stressed out. I neglected my mental health.
Although moments of it were fun and meaningful it felt like a distraction from doing what I really needed to do. Once I took a step back and focused on healing I was able to begin the real work - recovery, and in turn I was able to fully develop my artistic practice.
I confronted the age-old saying "you have to be the one to save yourself".

In the past I overly relied on others and let people take control because I was young and unsure of myself. I lost lots of money trying to make something work that ultimately didn't feel right mishandled some of it too. And some of it was mishandled on my behalf! But in the process of failing so many times I learned some invaluable lessons I decided that I was going to get a second job and save up as much as I could so I could afford to release an album independently and
rebuild my foundation as an artist. I worked from 10 am to mid
night, took out
credit cards, and
borrowed money
from friends.
I wrote and recorded the album on my days off when I wasn't sleeping. I shut myself
away in my apartment and found a new world inside
of my head.
Somewhere along the way, a flip
permanently switched. I got better at whatever
this is. I started making music I felt proud of for the first time

ASTRID
PIERCE

XO

Last Ditch Effort the debut album by astrid pierce

Shan Nation
Don't Look Back
Sullent
Cherry
Split Ends
Yellow
Fantasy
Sellingwater
You Don't Care

by astrid pierce

