

Joyce Manor releases their seventh album "I Used to Go to This Bar" this month, produced by Bad Religion's Brett Gurewitz

The South Bay pop-punk legends explore economic anxiety and suburban alienation, themes rooted in their Torrance and Long Beach upbringing. After nearly two decades and recent tours with Weezer, the longtime Epitaph Records act performs Coachella this spring. One hour into cruising the streets in a car near the Pacific coastline of Long Beach, the band Joyce Manor's sight-seeing leads to the destination that, to their amusement, is now a pop-punk landmark:

the Joyce Manor midcentury condominium off Alamitos Avenue. With its Art Deco lettering and being a stone's throw from Ocean Boulevard, this cozy condo complex feels like a humble monument to SoCal Americana. You could picture Elvis walking out of here in one of his classic surfing movies.

This is indeed where Joyce Manor got its name, but it's not quite ground zero — that's a few miles east in nearby Torrance. Bassist Matt Ebert confirms it's a fan destination, where people post on social media about their pilgrimages.
