

Interview with Susannah Joffe

Susannah Joffe builds a world where old country sounds meet dream-pop haze, and where emotional honesty cuts straight through the quiet.

Raised in Texas but now based in New York, Joffe once attempted to transition from her southern roots, but this project leans into them instead. Across its tracks, she channels the ache of separation, the sting of heartbreak, and the strange beauty of growing into a sound that's uniquely hers.

Standing out with strawberry blond hair and bedazzled caps, Joffe's music embodies the grit of Austin's country-blues roots and fittingly pairs it with the colors of queer pop. This style complements her distinct genre that fuses indie pop with her singer songwriter/indie rock hometown sound. Susannah grew up surrounded by the arts and culture of Austin

TX. She booked her first gig as a 16-year-old and has been building her career ever since. Her father introduced her to songwriting when she was 14 and the two continue to co-write today which brings unique observer's perspective to her lyrics while still maintaining the vulnerability of her songs
